LEE DAFFIN: Most people become interested in psychology because they want to help other people. So they want to go into clinical psychology or counseling psychology. Some come in for the research side of it.

Others come in, they want to teach down the line. But what makes our program unique, is students can be involved. They could be helping and teaching and classes, conducting research so that we can provide them strong letters of recommendation.

So it's a very unique aspect of most online programs, and a lot of students on campuses don't even take advantage of that. So our students have a great opportunity. A lot of them jump on it and do really well with it.

Psychology interfaces with almost every major area out there. Students can go into research areas. They could go work in a laboratory somewhere.

Students typically go into HR. Quite a few go in the criminal justice related areas. Many go into sociology or human development.

Some are premed. Some go into law afterwards. Some students use it as a basis to go into teaching at the K through 12 level. So you can pretty much go into anything, and psychology gives them a firm foundation to do that.

When you go on the job market, you've got to stand out. You've got to have recommendation letters or references. And doing these other experiences, these other opportunities we offer can make you stand out from the crowd and get that job that you're really looking for or going into that grad program.

But even after you get done with your grad program, you're looking to go into a job down the line. So it's still the same in the end, getting a job in the future. But, again, we go beyond just simple classes.

We have a community that everybody kind of comes together in. We have TA experiences, and tutor, and research experiences. All that together makes our program-- basically, it gives you tremendous bang for your buck.
